

Finlay New Developments 2010

Job Creation

Company Director Colman Finlay outlined the company's plan to try and create new employment during 2010;

“As a small business we are very aware of the impact ones job has ones family and the wider community. We have been fortunate to have been able to provide employment continually in the production of coffins for over 77 years and in that time we have had some great people work with us like Jim Carroll in our finishing department who has been with us for 47 of those 77 years.

Early in 2009 we like everyone else in Ireland became aware of the terrible spectre of unemployment returning and we decided to see what we (in our own small way) could do to try and protect and hopefully create some new employment.

The outcome of this has been the creation of Finlay Engineering a new part of our business which has been established to produce specialist metal products for our Funeral clients. To date, we have designed and produced a new coffin lift, embalming tables, trolleys, and stretchers. Finlay Engineering is a small enterprise and consequently we are flexible and can bespoke make a product to a specific design as required.

Through Finlay Engineering we can competitively supply products which to date have had to be imported and in so doing we are securing, and given time we will create new jobs on the island of Ireland.”

Excellence in Funeral Products and Services